

When we look at the job growth figures, we see that 21,000 jobs were created last month. The true story, however, is that none of these jobs were in the private sector. Furthermore, the country needs to add about 125,000 jobs a month just to keep up with population growth. If we count the net 2.3 million jobs that have been lost to this country since this administration took office and add the 4.7 million jobs that are needed to be created since then to support our population growth, we have a 7 million job gap in the labor market.

The measly job growth we have seen in recent months will not even begin to put a dent in that job gap; and, to make matters worse, the rolls of our long-term unemployed workers are growing. Technically, workers who have been out of work for more than 6 months are defined as long-term unemployed. Six months also happens to be the maximum length of regular unemployment benefits. Therefore, most economists consider the number of long-term unemployed workers as indicative of the need for temporary unemployment benefits.

If my Republican colleagues need further proof of our need for a temporary extension of unemployment benefits, I would encourage them to look at the number of long-term unemployed workers in this country. In each of the past 3 months, almost 1.9 million unemployed workers have been counted as long-term unemployed. America's long-term unemployed represent 23 percent of the country's total unemployed workers, at least those who are counted.

Moreover, the level of long-term unemployment is three times what it was when the recession began. Job growth in this country is, without question, weaker than any other post-World War II recovery period. As each week of this jobless recovery goes by, 80,000 more workers exhaust their unemployment benefits and have nowhere to turn.

A recent Congressional Budget Office study shows that, without these benefits, unemployed Americans double their chances of entering poverty and lacking health insurance. Mr. Speaker, the need for an extension of unemployment benefits has never been greater. In the absence of true job creation, it is imperative that these benefits be extended.

Again, when we see outsourcing, offshoring happening in the high-tech community, and we see the continual hemorrhaging of blue collar jobs being lost, our American worker's income security and their health depend on that extension.

CHILDREN'S EXPRESS LANE TO HEALTH COVERAGE ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Ms. CARSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Ms. CARSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to invite my colleagues to cosponsor bipartisan legislation authored by Senator RICHARD LUGAR in the United States Senate and myself in the House of Representatives known over here as H.R. 4031. The measure will help States in their efforts to enroll income-eligible children in the States Children's Health Insurance Program, commonly referred to as SCHIP.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, despite gains in recent years, nearly 9 million children in the United States remain uninsured. Of those, nearly 7 million children are eligible for public health insurance coverage. H.R. 4031, the Children's Express Lane to Health Coverage Act, builds on the successful legislation of the 106th Congress that provides States with the option of using the National School Lunch Program, the Women's, Infants, and Children Program to identify uninsured children eligible for benefits under the SCHIP and Medicare program. Many States have used this cost-saving option successfully to promote the well-being of income-eligible children.

While existing law does allow children to be income-eligible for WIC based on their enrollment in the Medicare program, it does not give the States adequate flexibility to make an income determination for eligibility for the Medicaid and SCHIP program based on the uninsured child's enrollment in WIC or another public program.

The Children's Express Lane to Health Coverage Act will give States the option of establishing that their Medicaid or SCHIP financial eligibility rules are satisfied when a family presents proof that their child is already enrolled in another program with comparable income levels. Current Federal law does not provide the flexibility that is necessary for this.

If we are to give our children, Mr. Speaker, a jump-start with quality health care and quality health insurance, I would encourage strongly that my colleagues consider becoming cosponsors of H.R. 4031, which is affectionately known as the Children's Express Lane to Health Coverage Act. It is vital, it is important, it is for our Nation's children.

FREE/FAIR TRADE AND UNEMPLOYMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. RYAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RYAN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I hail from the Great State of Ohio, where we have lost 300,000 jobs since George Bush has been President, 2,000 a week, 260 a day. In Youngstown, the biggest city in my district, we have an unemployment rate of 16 percent. In the city of Warren, the second largest city in my district, we have an unemployment rate of 14 percent. This President's economic policies are clearly not working in the industrial Midwest.

Now, the gentleman from Texas who was up a few moments before me was talking about all of the benefits of free trade, and he said that it increased wages in this country, he said it increased the standard of living in this country, and he said that it lowered prices for consumers in this country. I do not think we can challenge the fact that free trade has clearly lowered prices or kept prices from getting out of control and from skyrocketing. I do not know if they clearly show the level of savings. I think the savings by off-shore cheap labor has been a boom for the corporations but not necessarily a boom all the way across the board for consumers.

But what I want to talk about tonight is just a few issues that I think the American people are beginning to recognize and understand.

First, on the issue of unemployment benefits.

We have human beings, we have workers who work throughout the United States of America who are running out of unemployment benefits, who are going to have nothing left, and we want to talk about the intellectual battles of free trade while United States citizens are going to fall through the cracks.

This administration's priorities have been tax cuts, tax cuts, tax cuts to the top 1 percent. They are a one-trick pony, this administration is and this Congress is. A one-trick pony. Tax cuts are the answers for any social ill that we have here, and it is not working.

Second, the debate between free trade and fair trade, I think, has been obscured. You are either for free trade, or you are against it, and you are for putting up protections and not agreeing to any trade whatsoever. When I talk about fair trade, I think we need to look at the issue on the whole, and we need to say to each other what the benefits of trading are and what are the downsides of free trade are.

The downsides are obvious. We are displacing workers. We have unemployment rates going through the roof. We are losing good-paying jobs for menial-wage jobs, and we are competing with a labor force that is getting paid nickels an hour, no health care benefits, no environmental relations, no OSHA, and we are asking American workers to
